The Capabilities of the Submarine Telegraph. The capabilities of the Atlantic Telegraph are such as warrant the belief that it will prove a medium of communication between the two hemispheres, through which can be transmitted more than the principal news items of the day, and those in their most condensed form—that is, until some method shall have been discovered whereby signals can be transmitted more rapidly than they are at present. The facts, as they stand at the present moment, or rather as they existed up to the latest dates that we have received from the Atlantic

States, are these: At the highest estimate, the number of words that can be transmitted from one continent to another will not exceed two per minute, or one hundred and twenty per hour. And a more reasonable estimate, from all the accounts that are before us, would be, perhaps, a considerably less number in this given time. Certainly, so far, then, as the eable is equal to the task of performing the amount of telegraphic duty that will be required of it, there can be no doubt that it will fall very far short of that duty, until some further means shall have been developed whereby the difficulties now in the way of the rapid transmission of signals shall have been overcome. And let it be understood that we are not now attempting to decry the vast benefits that are to result from it, even in its present contracted ability to perform all the service required from it, but are rather viewing it in the light of a scientific problem that remains yet to be solved.

The facts are these: When the Submarine Telegraph was laid down from London to the Hague, it was discovered, for the first time, that with the Morse instruments signals could not be correctly and rapidly transmitted. This led to inquiry and examination, by which it was shown that, although a naked wire suspended in the air will convey signals " as fast as the instrument can be worked," when " it is covered with gutta percha, and immersed in water, it retains the electricity and the charge, and communicated to the wire, it requires time for its discharge."

" The first signal made is transmitted almost instantaneously through the conducting wire to the other end; but the wire does not readily part with the charge, and the electricity it retains prevents the el-Everybody remembers the fable of the beauti- fect of a second signal from being perceived on the ful Atalanta, who would not marry any man who distant instrument.
